Having an unrestricted driver's license at age 16 can be dangerous for other drivers. If you have to gradually get that freedom then you have a better chance to learn what you need to know. If you are only allowed a small number of people in your car then it would be a safer ride, and if you are restricted on the hours you can drive then you won't be out all hours of the night.

First of all, if you are given a longer time with a restricted license then there will have to be someone there to watch your driving and help you get better. This is better then just being set free driving by yourself and having no guidance. The more you practice driving with somone experienced the more experienced you will get.

Secondly, having a small number of passengers in your car will limit safety hazards. If there are a large amount of people in your car then you are less likely to pay attention to the road like you are suppose to. If you have too many people in your vehicle you are not just putting them in danger you are also putting other people on the road in danger because you couldn't pay attention.

Thirdly, if you could just drive at all hours of the day and night you would be possibly be a danger to others. Driving really late at night, you would be less attentive to things around you. If you could just stay out all night then it would probably make you late for work, or school because you were up too late. If everyone who just got their permit was driving all of the time whenever they please then there would be a much higher accident rate due to lack of experience.

~~T~~ I To sum up what I have said, the gradual driving system is a smart idea. I know if I was a parent I would be worried about a child who doesn't have much driving experience, just being able to drive whenever they want and carry as many passengers as they want. Would you be willing to just let your child go and do as they please and possibly put others in danger?
